Great Miami River Trail 25

From urban skylines to beautiful river vistas, the Great Miami River Trail has something for everyone. The 10'-12' wide trail winds its way by museums, picnic facilities, acres of natural parkland, and over gently rolling terrain – a perfect match for the runner, skater or cyclist.

From the current southern terminus in Franklin it travels along the levee to the north, passing historical points of interest and parks in Miamisburg and southern Dayton. The trail through downtown Dayton splits and follows both sides of the Great Miami River, connecting to the Wolf Creek Trail (38) and the Mad River Trail (8) by the RiverScape hub. The central section wanders north, where the Stillwater River Trail (7) branches to the west. The Great Miami River Trail continues through grassy floodplains by the Taylorsville Dam, into the heavily wooded Taylorsville MetroPark and Tadmor Historic Site.

The newest section of trail extends north to Tipp City's Kyle Park, and then 7 miles further up to Troy, the seat of Miami County. The northern section contains a short gap between Troy and Piqua, where the trail crosses the east-west Ohio to Indiana Trail (36) and follows the Great Miami River up past Johnson Farm Historical Area. The total trail length is more than 50 miles.

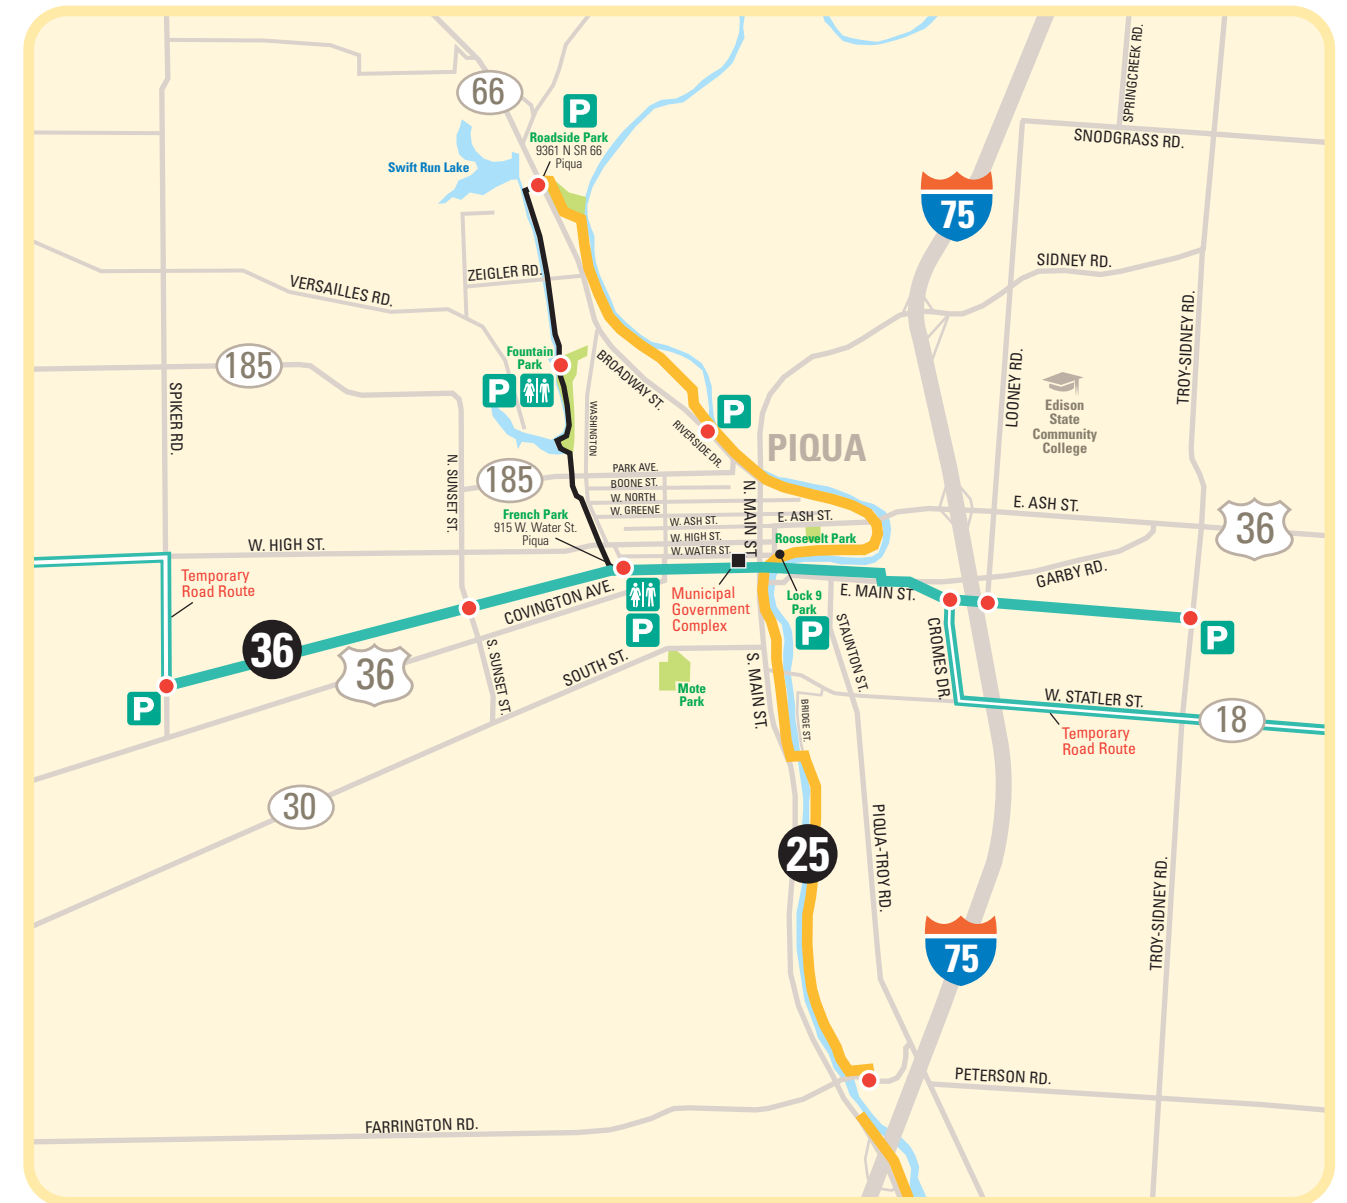

Ohio to Indiana Trail 36

This trail is a straight path on an old railroad bed that features a bridge over the Great Miami River. The trail offers connections to Main Street, Miami Valley Centre Mall and a 6.7-mile loop that travels along the Great Miami River and the city's hydraulic canal system, which connects three ponds and lakes, and provides a wonderful scenery.

Temporary on-road routes extend to the east and west of Piqua, while the plans for extending the trail are explored. Additional sections of this trail are built west of Bradford and in Greenville.
